

Attention FCC:

I am a customer of XM-Radio. Not only do I love the service but I think the move into tomorrow's technology is so very exciting. What scares me is that our government agencies will lower themselves to put a leash around XM-Radio's neck because some lazy and whining service doesn't like the fact that technology is growing.

I have just been through this very same issue with Direct TV. The FCC grew weary of listening to local television broadcasters whining that satellite broadcasting was "robbing" them of their market and passed a new law. My ability to receive NBC broadcasting was ripped from my home and the local broadcasting manager thumbed his nose at me when I asked for a letter releasing my NBC coverage back to me.

I think this is so very wrong. You don't hear (at least not yet) Kmart complaining to whomever that the Walmart across the street is selling the same "XYZ" brand soap and stealing their market- In turn making a ruling that since I live on Kmart's side of the block, I can't cross the street and buy XYZ brand from Walmart. As wacked as our world's common reasoning and sense is, I know that day is coming.

Until then, let's put those whining, lazy, and closed-minded people to skite and tell them, "Wake up! This is the new dawn of technology and freedom. Get with the program. Roll your sleeves up and get busy!"
